DESCRIPTION

Bossa Nova is built on a codex: musical durations translated into surface. A bossa nova clave — dotted quarter, dotted quarter, quarter — becomes five geometric forms whose proportions are exact and whose arrangement is free. The support is the measure; the forms fill it completely. The musical structure is the invariant. What the eye encounters is not music, and not its illustration. It is something the codex has produced that neither medium could have produced alone. This is the ideamorphic condition. The emitter fixes the wave — the proportional logic, the structural constraint — and releases it into form. The receiver stands before five shapes in sand and constructs something: a rhythm they may never name, a tension between relief and hollow, a sense of fullness without knowing why the surface feels complete. The recognition is real. Its source is inaccessible. Diffraction is already underway.

The work will disappear. When Arnaud Quercy ends its cycle, no object remains — only what each visitor has already made of it. The emission is not diminished by this. The codex survives the form. What was received cannot be unreceived. Bossa Nova is the first work in a series that translates rhythmic structures into space across multiple mediums. Each piece is a single measure, complete in itself. Each disappearance is part of the score.
